Completion of the course taught by Commodore Longfellow qualifies the student for a standard Red Cross first-aid certificate.

GOULD WINS 14th GAME

Gould Academy registered its fourteenth victory of the season last week in defeating Gorham High 26-18. The game was considerably more one-sided than the score indicates as Gould stepped into a big lead that they held throughout the major part of the game. McFarland's Eagle eye started the local quintet off to a good start as he scored the first three baskets of the game and helped to bring up the Gould total of 13-0 at the end of the first period. The remainder of the game proved to be more or less of a defensive battle with Gorham cutting down a few points of the margin before the game ended.

Wentzell did a great job of defense work against Gorham's star scorer, Rhuland. He held the team's leading scorer scoreless from the field, his only tally being one free throw for the game. McFarland and Robertson carried off the honors of the day playing heads-up basketball.

In a preliminary game the Gorham second team defeated Gould 30-19.

RAILWAY PURCHASES WIDE SPREAD

The railroads in 1937 bought materials and supplies or fuel in 117 cities and towns distributed throughout every one of the 16 counties in the state of Maine. This fact and the nation-wide spread of railway purchases was revealed in a series of exhibits which J. J. Pelley, President of the Association of American Railroads, recently presented to the special Senate Committee now investigating Unemployment and Relief.

For the nation as a whole, these exhibits showed that last year purchases of materials, supplies and fuel amounted to a total of $900,000,000 were made by the railroads in 12,174 cities and towns located in 2,537 counties of a total of 3,072 counties in the 48 states of the nation. These purchases included approximately 70,000 different items and thus affected industry and agriculture everywhere.

In 1929 and 1930 railway purchases of materials, supplies and fuel averaged $1,184,000,000 annually. In the five years from 1931 to 1935 this yearly average dropped to $559,819,800. In 1936, railway purchases of materials, supplies and fuel increased to $893,421,000. The first half of 1937 resulted in a further increase in railway purchases of materials, supplies and fuel, the total for the year amounting to approximately $900,000,000. The subsequent sharp decline in traffic volume and revenues, especially in the fourth quarter of the year, has resulted in a necessary and drastic reduction in railway purchases.

Mr. Pelley, in presenting these exhibits to the Senate Committee, pointed out that increased revenues and a return of normal traffic would bring about a resumption of railroad buying in large volume which, in turn, would stimulate industrial activity throughout the nation and the reemployment of thousands of workers. To build one freight car, he said, requires materials from 31 different states and provides 197 man-hours of employment—approximately a year's work for one man.

Pills, Dividend Checks and Tax Bills of Every Individual, National and International Problem:
Inseparable from Local Welfare

"My feeling about this bill is that from the standpoint of intelligible legislation it is the most completely conglomerate mess of involved language which was ever perpetrated upon a free people." Thus said Senator Vandenberg, most dependable spokesman for the minority party on Capitol Hill, express his opinion of the new farm bill. Mr. Vandenberg was more biting than most—but it is a matter of record that the bill has few real friends. Attitude of many of those who voted for it is probably neatly reflected in George Norris' observation that "perhaps it will not work—but what will work?"

It is impossible to adequately brief the bill in a short space—it consumed 102 pages of print in its final, approved form. Briefly, it attempts to include in one measure three previously tried farm-aid legislative theories—voluntary crop control, as provided for in the original AAA law; compulsory crop control as provided for in the Cotton and Tobacco Acts, and the voluntary reduction of soil-depleting acreage, which was the purpose behind the Soil Conservation Act.

It seems a dead certainty that there is going to be a lot of litigation in the courts before the meaning of some of the more involved clauses is made legally clear. However, one thing is plain—the bill is designed to extend sweeping governmental regulation and control over production and prices of the four principle farm crops—wheat, cotton, corn and tobacco. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to establish a national acreage allotment for each crop; to allow cooperating farmers loans on crops whenever prices fall below the parity level; and, under certain restrictions, to establish compulsory marketing quotas, whenever the national supply of any crop exceeds a specified level.

To say that the law starts its career under a cloud is simply to state a fact. It was received very coolly by almost all farm organizations, and a number of granges went on record in flat opposition. Its constitutionality is far from sure. The overwhelming majority of economists regard it as something of a monstrosity. Even its sponsors, with few exceptions, are unenthusiastic—the bill is frankly a compromise, designed to achieve the next-to-impossible task of reconciling bitterly opposed interests and views in a single act. It was not adequately debated in the House—a large number of members, when the time came to vote, had not even seen a copy of the text, the supply being inadequate. And it passed the Senate, 55 to 31, after only three days of consideration on the floor.

Thus came into existence the first major law of the second regular session of the current Congress. The session has been distinguished by a great deal of talk, and little accomplishment. It spent weeks on the doomed anti-lynching bill, and is far behind in its calendar. The chance of the Congress, especially the Senate, "getting together" is still poor. Majority leader Barkley has an unenviable job these days—the revolters in his ranks against White House domination steadily increase in number, even though much of the dissent and acrimony is kept quiet, and out of the public prints. The President is keeping to a more or less "hands-off" policy in his relation with the lawmakers. The big thing in the minds of all the Congressmen these days is whether or not the people still subscribe to the doctrines and policies of the New Deal. Until that question is answered by votes, in the November elections, fence-sitting will be the order of the day.

Hitler's speech of February 20th, in which he served notice on the world, especially England, that he intends to get back Germany's lost colonial empire, made a great splash in the headlines—but it didn't come as any surprise to those in touch with foreign affairs.

Colonial expansion has long been the ex-housepainters' most persistent ambition—and along with it he wants expansion of German influence on the continent. And the fact of the matter is, though diplomats have prettier words for it, that Germany has lately conquered a new territory. That territory is Austria. The recent deal between Hitler and the Austrian Chancellor, Kurt Schuschnigg, whereby the banned Nazi movement has been made legal in Austria, and the Austrian cabinet has been reorganized with pro-Nazis in the important seats, was a German victory of the first importance.

Most important of all recent events perhaps, is the cabinet trouble in England. Eden, the idealist, who supported Haile Selassie against Italy, who attempted to revive the waning power of the League, who hates the dictators, has resigned. He could no longer go along with Prime Minister Chamberlain's "peace at any price" policy of making concessions to Germany and Italy.

This is described as the gravest cabinet crisis in England since 1914. Eden has a tremendous following in England, and his resignation has made the position of the Chamberlain government definitely shaky.

THE LOW DOWN HICKORY GROVE

Down on our corner we got a nice little drug store—with a pee-wee P. O. in the back—and the fellow who runs it, we call him Dock, and he is around 60 and a pleasant kind of party.

And the reason I am tellin' about him, is because he is one person who is not squawkin' about big business eating him alive, but he is goin' ahead and selling whisk-brooms, and sodas, and lip-stick, and stamps—and I reckon some drugs, maybe.

And Dock he does not have a stomach ache about the chain stores, etc., and he is makin' money and sellin' our family a new kind of tooth-brush every time we go in, and he has 4 or 5 clerks—and is not a gloom—so we all go back.

But he says the woods is full of meddlers, like little business versus big business, and all kinds, who don't know sour apples—and especially, down there on the Potomac. But he says it has been great stuff for his business, so far—says he is out of head-ache powders half the time.

Yours, with the low down,
JO SERRA

GOULD DEFEATS SOUTH PARIS

Gould Academy completed its 1938 season with a 47-30 victory over South Paris High School. Johnson and McFarland with 16 and 11 points led the Gould scoring. For the losers Durgin collected 12 points and Lahti 8.

The slippery surface of the gym floor made playing difficult hence the type of play on both teams was far below what the teams were capable of showing.

Gould got away to a big lead in the first half and gained its final victory with little trouble.

WHAT HAS HAPPENED BEFORE
 Bill Jordan, a young clerk working in a strange city, is lonely on his twenty-first birthday. He asks a strange girl to help him celebrate his anniversary. They go to a cheap night club where another man tries to take the girl away from Bill. She refuses to go and the man calls her a foul name. Bill goes to her defense and demands that the stranger apologize. They get into a fight and the man reaches for his hip pocket. Thinking the man has a gun, Bill grabs a water carafe and hits him on the head. The man dies and Bill is arrested. District Attorney Mathews sympathizes with the boy's plight. It is, he says, an unfortunate circumstance that might happen to anyone. Instead of trying Jordan for second degree murder, Mathews allows the boy to plead guilty to manslaughter. Bill is sentenced to ten years in the state penitentiary. Six years later we find Bill a hardened, embittered prisoner. He has been working in the prison jail mill since his incarceration and the dirt and dust of the mill is breaking him down. His lungs are affected and he is close to nervous collapse. One of his cellmates says he might be able to arrange a transfer from the new warden. When Bill learns that the new warden is the same Tom Mathews who sent him up he laughs bitterly. His cellmate discloses that the convicts are preparing a surprise welcome for the warden when he arrives the following day.

NOW GO ON WITH THE STORY
Chapter Two

"I think you'll find this a nice office, Tom," Commissioner McNulty of the State Prison Board was showing the new warden around the prison. Tom Mathews stared at the door.
 "Come in and inspect your daddy's new office," he said. He stepped aside to allow his daughter, Elizabeth—slim, wide-eyed and attractive—to come in followed by her aunt, Katie Mathews, who was to be her brother's housekeeper at the prison and chaperone for her niece.
 Elizabeth walked to the desk, inspected it and then strolled over to the window that looked out on the prison yard. The men were having their recreation period but, instead of the usual hubbub and activity of these daily periods, the yard was strangely quiet. The men were standing quietly, all eyes turned up to the warden's windows.
 A Warm Reception
 As Elizabeth appeared in the window a low murmur rose from the men. She shrank back involuntarily. "How—how many prisoners are there, Daddy?" she asked.
 Mathews looked inquiringly at Grady, captain of the prison guards, who was standing beside the desk. "Twenty-five hundred and fifty-two, Mr. Mathews," he said.
 "Yeah," Mathews grinned. "And I'll bet I convicted more than a thousand of those fellows myself. He walked over and joined his daughter at the window. With one voice the men in the yard sent up a full-throated, derisive "YAH!" as soon as they saw Mathews.
 Mathews turned, bewildered, to Grady. "What is it," he asked.
 "They call it 'hammering' air," Grady explained. "They do it when they're sore at something or somebody. This is probably their idea of welcoming you. I'd better go down and shut them up."
 Mathews smiled down at his daughter. "I'm sure popular with the boys, eh?"
 "Don't let that worry you, sir," Grady said. "We'll shut them up. He started for the door.
 "Wait a minute Grady," Mathews ordered. "You stay here. I'll go down there myself."
 "You'd better not, Tom," McNulty interposed. "It may mean trouble."
 Mathews took a cigar from his mouth and turned belligerently.

"Yeah?" he asked. "And if I don't go down—then what? They'll think I'm afraid of them. Listen: I've been taking taxpayers' money for a long time now. When I was district attorney it was my job to get convictions—and I got 'em. Well, now I'm warden. It's my job to boss this prison. An' that's just what I'm going to do! I ain't that right, sven?"
 He turned and gave Elizabeth a quick hug. Then he strode from the office.
 The men were still yammering when the door to the administration building opened and Tom Mathews stepped out alone. Mathews watched them curiously for a moment. Then he relighted his cigar, tossed the match away and walked down among the men in the yard.

As he approached they opened a lane for him and he was quickly in the midst of the mob. Well toward the center of the yard he made out the tall, menacing figure of a Tex, a lifer he had sent up for murder. Mathews guessed rightly that Tex was one of the leaders of the convicts. He walked directly toward Tex.

"Hello, Tex," he said affably. "Haven't seen you since we were in court together."

Tex, unable to hide his admiration for the new warden's nerve, smiled briefly. "Hiya, Mr. Mathews," he said.

"Tell the boys to shut up," Mathews commanded. Tex studied the warden for a moment then he turned to the men close behind. "Pass the word along to pipe down," he ordered.

When the yard was still Mathews spoke again. "I've sent up a lot of the boys here in my time, Tex," he said. "You were one of 'em. That was my job an' I did it. Now I'm the warden here. It's my job to boss this prison an' I'm going to do it. But I'll do it fair an' square. Every man in here will be treated according to how he behaves. If any of them want to be tough, that's okay with me. I can be tough, too. If they play on the level with me I'll treat them the same way. Tell that to the boys, Tex."

Mathews turned and strode through the silent prisoners back to his office.

The New Chauffeur

With the passing weeks Bill Jordan found the jail mill increasingly unbearable. One day he collapsed and was taken to the prison hospital. The doctor examined him. He studied his record, noted the boy's youth and then he went to the warden. On the doctor's recommendation Mathews sent for Jordan.
 When Jordan was brought to the warden's office Mathews looked at the card on his desk. "Your name is William Jordan," he said. "Mind if I call you 'Bill'?"
 There was a hint of bitterness in Jordan's voice when he replied. "You asked me that once before," he said.

Mathews studied him more closely. "Yeah," he said. "Now I remember. The Parker case. Lemme see, that was six years ago."

At that moment the door opened and Elizabeth came into the office. She stopped just inside the door and looked at Bill curiously. When Bill saw her his drooping shoulders straightened instinctively. He looked down at his dirty, grimy clothes and then tried to hide his gnarled hands behind his back.
 "We're having tea, Father," Elizabeth said.

Mathews looked up at her. "What's that?" he asked. "Tea? All right. Run along. I'll be there in a minute." Bill watched her go and Mathews, turning back to his desk, noted the change in the boy's face. He studied the card before him.

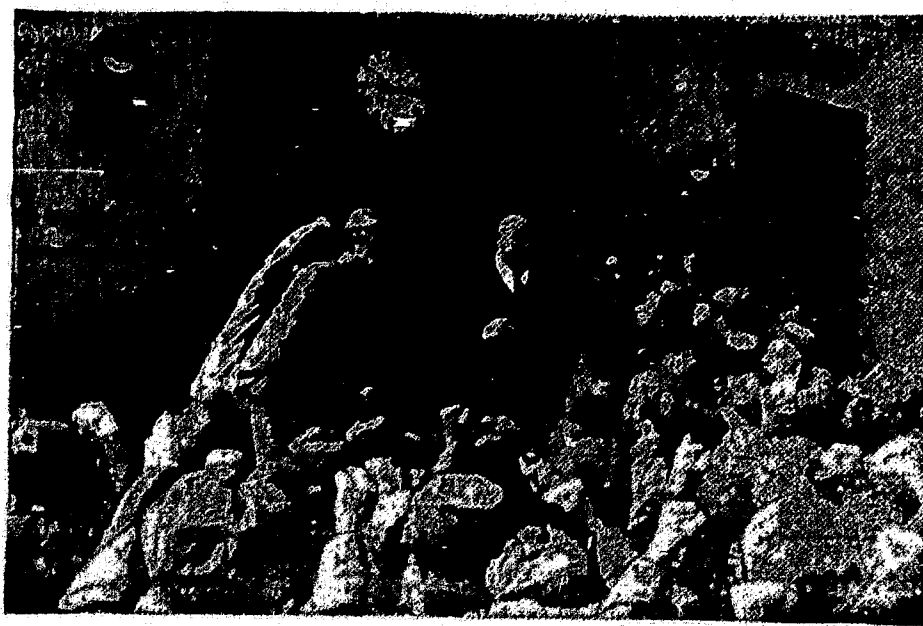

"Change of occupation and environment recommended," he muttered to himself. He looked up at Jordan.

"Can you drive a car, son?" he asked.

"Yes, sir," Bill replied.

"Then you've got a new job. Starting tomorrow you're my chauffeur."
